For year, Republicans, including President Donald Trump, have denied accusations that the Trump campaign colluded with the Russian government during the 2016 election. The basis for the claim was the accusation that the Trump campaign was informed about Russia's attempts to hack Democratic email accounts and that the Trump campaign, and Trump himself, made effort to stop the efforts. The claim has been supported by information from former Clinton campaign manager John Podesta, who told the Washington Post he was given proof of Trump campaign contacts with Russian officials. But in recent days, Trump's campaign and some of his allies have opened the door to admitting that the Trump campaign did collude with Russia to meddle in the election. This was the case with Trump lawyer Michael Cohen, who admitted to having contacts with Kremlin-linked Russians while he was working for the Trump Organization. The man behind that admission was Robert Mueller, the special counsel in charge of the investigation into the Trump campaign's collusion with Russia. On Tuesday, Cohen pleaded guilty to a single count of campaign finance law violation, admitting that he made an illegal payment to silence Stormy Daniels, a pornographic film star and adult film director, who claims she had an affair with Trump. Mueller has been investigating the Trump campaign's possible collusion with Russia, and has impaneled a special counsel to oversee the investigation of Russian meddling. The probe has resulted in seven indictments and
